The Beatles' music evolved significantly during their October 1964 tour. The band began the tour with a setlist that was heavily influenced by their early influences, such as Elvis Presley and Chuck Berry. However, as the tour progressed, The Beatles began to experiment with new sounds and styles.

One of the most notable changes in The Beatles' music during this period was the increased use of harmonies. The band had always used harmonies in their songs, but on the October 1964 tour, they began to experiment with more complex and sophisticated arrangements. This was due in part to the influence of Brian Wilson of The Beach Boys, who The Beatles had met earlier that year.

The band had always used electric guitars on their records, but on the October 1964 tour, they began to use them more frequently in their live performances. This was due in part to the influence of The Rolling Stones, who The Beatles had also met earlier that year.

The Beatles' musical evolution during the October 1964 tour was a reflection of their growing maturity as musicians. The band was no longer content to simply play covers of other artists' songs. They were now beginning to develop their own unique sound and style.
