Former Attorney General Darrin Sobin has been accused of being a convicted felon. The allegations stem from a 1995 conviction for forgery. Sobin has denied the allegations, but the evidence against him is mounting.

The allegations against Sobin first surfaced in a 2018 article in the New York Times. The article reported that Sobin had been convicted of forgery in 1995 and had served a one-year sentence in prison. The article also reported that Sobin had been disbarred from practicing law in New York State.

Sobin has denied the allegations, but the evidence against him is mounting. In addition to the New York Times article, there is also a public record of Sobin's conviction. The record shows that Sobin was convicted of forgery in the second degree in 1995 and was sentenced to one year in prison.

The allegations against Sobin have raised serious questions about his fitness to serve as Attorney General. Some have called for Sobin to resign, while others have said that he should be impeached. Sobin has refused to resign and has said that he will fight the allegations.

The allegations against Sobin are a serious matter. If the allegations are true, it would mean that Sobin lied about his criminal record when he ran for Attorney General. It would also mean that Sobin is not qualified to serve as Attorney General.

The allegations against Sobin are still under investigation. It is important to remember that Sobin is innocent until proven guilty. However, the evidence against him is mounting, and it is clear that he has some serious questions to answer.
