Drawing on their deep experience in military strategy and international relations, Stavridis and Fontaine argue that the United States must adopt a multi-pronged approach to deter China from invading Taiwan. This approach includes:

- Strengthening Taiwan's defenses: The United States must help Taiwan develop a more robust and capable defense force, including providing Taiwan with advanced weapons systems and training.
- Bolstering the U.S.-Taiwan relationship: The United States must strengthen its political and economic ties with Taiwan, and make clear that it will come to Taiwan's aid in the event of an invasion.
- Building a coalition of partners: The United States must work with its allies and partners in the region to create a coalition that is capable of deterring China from invading Taiwan.

li>Improving military deterrence: The United States must improve its military deterrence posture in the Indo-Pacific region, including by increasing the number of U.S. forces in the region and conducting regular joint exercises with allies and partners.

In addition to these measures, Stavridis and Fontaine also call for a concerted effort to reduce tensions between the United States and China. They argue that the two countries should establish a dialogue on military issues, and work together to address common challenges, such as climate change and nuclear proliferation.

"Stopping Taiwan Invasion" is a timely and important book that provides a comprehensive blueprint for deterring China from invading Taiwan. Stavridis and Fontaine offer a clear-eyed assessment of the challenges facing the United States and its allies, and they provide a path forward that is both realistic and achievable.

This book is essential reading for anyone who is interested in the future of the Indo-Pacific region. It is a must-read for policymakers, military professionals, and anyone who is concerned about the security of Taiwan.
