The King's Dragoon Guards were one of the most elite cavalry regiments in the British Army. They were known for their bravery and their skill in battle. At Waterloo, the Dragoon Guards played a key role in the British victory. They charged into the French lines, breaking their ranks and causing them to retreat.

The Battle

The Battle of Waterloo began at dawn on June 18, 1815. The French Army attacked the British lines in a series of waves. The British infantry held their ground, but the French cavalry was able to break through their lines in several places.

The King's Dragoon Guards were free to charge the French cavalry. They rode into the fray, their sabres flashing. The French cavalry was no match for the Dragoon Guards, and they were quickly routed.

The Dragoon Guards continued to charge into the French lines, breaking their ranks and causing them to retreat. The French Army was eventually defeated, and the British Army emerged victorious.

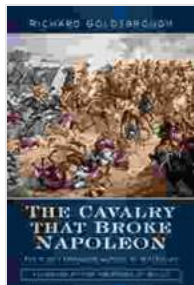

The Aftermath

The Battle of Waterloo was a costly victory for the British Army. The Dragoon Guards lost many men in the battle, including their commanding officer, Colonel John Miller. However, their sacrifice was not in vain. The British victory at Waterloo ensured the defeat of Napoleon Bonaparte and the end of the Napoleonic Wars.

The King's Dragoon Guards continued to serve with distinction in the British Army. They fought in many other wars, including the Crimean War, the Boer War, and the First World War. The regiment is still in existence today, and it remains one of the most elite cavalry regiments in the world.

The King's Dragoon Guards At Waterloo is a gripping account of one of the most famous and decisive battles in history. Written by a renowned historian, the book tells the story of the brave men of the King's Dragoon Guards who fought valiantly against the overwhelming odds. Through vivid descriptions and meticulous research, the author brings the battle to life, capturing the chaos, the courage, and the ultimate sacrifice of the soldiers who fought that day.
